The Crawford Fund's annual conference holds a key place in the development and food security calendar. For more than two decades we have successfully brought into focus an issue worthy of global and Australian attention. This year will be no exception. Titled 'Waste Not, Want Not: The Circular Economy to Food Security', our 2016 conference will focus on food loss and waste issues along the supply chain—in production, in getting product to market, and in the management and reuse of waste.

This focus comes just as a number of international and Australian efforts get underway within both public and private sectors in research, policy and on-the-ground action. We consider this an ideal time to delve deeper into the way ahead around food loss and waste for improved food security.

By attracting the world's best speakers, providing extended Q&A sessions and opportunities for informal networking, the Fund's annual conferences enable participants to contribute and to place food security issues into a context relevant to their lives and work. Being the key event around food security, the networking opportunities are always highly appreciated.
